Placing due responsibility upon all branches of the work, yet the ultimate success of the poultryman depends almost entirely upon the hatching and rearing of the chicks. The incubation, growth and development must be governed by such conditions as will bring the little chick from the shell in a normal, healthy state, permitting the building of a strong, vigorous constitution as it passes through the various stages of development. If not the grown bird will lack the constitutional power necessary for prolific egg production) or breeding purposes, thus failing to yield but little, if any, more than a nominal profit for its owner. This handicap does not terminate in the matured bird or at the end of the first generation, but instead will establish itself to a still greater extent in the offspring. Matured birds lacking in vitality and perfect development, if used for breeding purposes, will transmit the weakness to such a marked degree as to cause a...
